The Swan, the Globe, and the Hope all located on the Bankside, a region just across the Thames south of the City of London. All these playhouses had to be built on marshland because the irrationality of the City of London forced the playwrights to the Bankside, where many other theatre works had to be performed to accommodate the growing demand for drama. The Swan could accommodate the royal court to watch plays and was located in a marshy area, which was not hospitable to the elaboration of many other theatres. The Bankside, a region just across the Thames south of the City of London, was surrounded by the Thames and the Ganges, and the Globe works were located on the

Hamlet

Shakespeare’s plays were different from the outdoor productions where we know them today. There is no existence of a prompt book. Performances were spontaneous and varied. The actor’s choices often influenced the course of the play. Shakespeare’s stage directions were minimal, allowing for interpretive flexibility. The audience was engaged in visual and auditory experiences, contributing to the overall atmosphere.
The critic comes and the writer of the new work is asked to observe the old work and to write something about it. The critic holds the new work in his hand and observes it. He asks the writer to observe the old work also. The writer is asked to observe the old work and to write something about it. He asks the critic to observe the new work also. The critic gives the old work to the writer and asks him to observe it. The writer observes the old work and observes the new work. He says that the critic is right.
